CANCER*care*[®]

Charles is an Emmy award-winning film producer, educator and Fulbright Scholar. He's also one of the more than 174,000 people helped by CancerCare each year.

Charles was diagnosed with sarcoma after noticing a large bump on his right leg. By the time it was discovered, the cancer had progressed to the point that Charles's health care team recommended amputation.

"I was very sick, and I lost a lot of weight," he recalls. "I went in for more chemo, but it was at the point where we were talking about hospice."

That's when Charles called CancerCare and began meeting with an oncology social worker for individual counseling. "I trusted him, and those conversations ended up making a huge difference," says Charles. He also benefitted from a support group created especially for amputees.

Today, as the COVID-19 crisis continues to create even more challenges for people like Charles, the demand for CancerCare programs and services is greater than ever.
